

Reactivity of Measures

- A measure is reactive if the measurement changes the behavior being studied.
- Being aware that someone is observing or measuring your behavior may change the way you behave.
- Allowing time for subjects to get used to being observed or measured minimizes reactivity.
- Nonreactive or unobtrusive measures are indirect measures of behavior - subjects are not aware of the measure.