Reactivity of Measures

• A measure is reactive if the measurement changes the behavior being studied.

• Being aware that someone is observing or measuring your behavior may change the way you behave.

• Allowing time for subjects to get used to being observed or measured minimizes reactivity.

• Nonreactive or unobtrusive measures are indirect measures of behavior - subjects are not aware of the measure.